Body

Dear Members of Parliament,

I attach the open correspondence I sent to the Prime Minister and to Sir Mark Rowley, Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, on 21 September 2026, together with the official transcripts of the final hearing in my financial remedy proceedings. I obtained those transcripts this month, more than two years after the judgment was published.

Paragraph 64 of the judgment found that I had "become obsessed" with hidden assets. The judgment went on to describe my legal spending as reckless "in the context of the wife's obsessive approach", and added £800,000 back against my share. A costs order of £255,654.50 followed, relying on the same authority.

The transcripts now allow the judgment to be tested against the record of what was said in court.

They record that on the fourth day the judge stopped the hearing because "Mrs Zahmoul is plainly in distress", and that my psychiatrist's letter was before him from the first day. Neither appears in the judgment.

For the first time since April 2024, I can set my own memory of that hearing against an objective record. The dissonance between what I remembered and what the judgment recorded had caused me severe distress. I could not make the two accounts fit. Two plus two is not five. I now understand why.

What happened in that courtroom no longer depends on my recollection. It can be read, tested and independently verified.

I am not in a position to pay the costs ordered. I have received no distribution under the financial order, and the settlement it provides falls well below what was anticipated.

Other matters remain unresolved. Two digital devices were placed into court-linked custody in April 2021. A review of them was required and never carried out, and their whereabouts are unknown. Criminal referrals arising from that have been made and are not yet determined.

I have commissioned an independent forensic reconstruction of the evidential record, to be followed by an independent legal assessment. I am not asking Parliament to determine disputed facts or to interfere with a judicial decision. I am making the underlying evidence independently verifiable, because the processes through which I sought examination of these matters are exhausted without one having examined the primary record.

From now on, the evidence, the reconstruction, the assessments and the institutional responses to them will form an external public record.

I want to be clear about why. I have spent six years using the processes available to me. The cost has been severe: financial hardship, repeated setbacks and periods of despair. I say it once, because it is part of the record too.

What remains is the evidence. It can now be examined.

Yours sincerely,

Nadia Zahmoul
